

WHITE BEAR.

In those desolate fields of ice which lock up the polar seas during a great part of the year, the White Bear (the Ursus Maritimus of Linnaeus) finds an abode congenial to his hardy nature. Prowling over the frozen wastes, he satisfies his hunger on the marine animals, such as seals, who break through the ice to breathe the open air; or he plunges into the sea in pursuit of his prey. Possessing an astonishingly acute scent, great activity and strength, and equal cunning, he contrives to support existence in regions where it might be thought that so large a quadruped must necessarily perish. Ever watchful, he ascends the hills of ice, called hummocks, to extend his range of observation over the wide plain where a solitary seal may perhaps be resting; or to snuff the tainted air, by which he knows that some remains of a whale, or a walrus (seahorse), deserted by the fishermen of Europe or the native Eskimaux, will afford him an ample feast. He doubtless often suffers long and extreme hunger; for the seal, which forms its chief subsistence, is as vigilant as the bear; and he is often carried out to sea upon some small island of ice, where he may remain for days without the possibility of procuring food. The Polar Bear has been seen floating in this way at a distance of two hundred miles from any land. Swimming excellently, he, however, often travels from one island of ice to another; or visits the shore, where he commits fearful ravages. In Iceland, where these destructive animals sometimes land, the inhabitants immediately collect together to destroy them. Near the east coast of Greenland, according to Captain Scoresby, in his account of the Arctic Regions, they have been seen on the ice in such quantities, that they were compared to flocks of sheep on a common.

The animal is ordinarily from 4 to 5 feet high, and from 7 to eight feet long, weighing from 600 lbs. to half a ton. Barentz, an early voyager in 1596, killed two enormous white bears in 1596, the skin of one of which measured 12 feet, and that of the other 13 feet. The cubs of this powerful animal are, however, not larger than rabbits. Hearne, a traveller of great authority, states that he has seen their foot-prints on the snow not larger than a crown-piece, when the impression of their dam's foot measured 14 inches by 9.

The polar bear generally retreats from man; but when attacked he is a formidable enemy. Captain Scoresby, in his Voyage to Greenland, gives several interesting anecdotes, which strikingly exhibit the power and courage of the animal.

The sagacity of the polar bear is well known to the whale fishers. They find the greatest difficulty in entrapping him, although he fearlessly approaches their vessels.

The female polar bear is as fierce in her hostility as the male, but nothing can exceed the affection which she feels for her young. The difficulty of procuring food for them, and the hardships to which they are exposed, no doubt call forth this quality. Some of the instances upon record are as singular as they are affecting.

When first my infant feet essay'd
The movements of my will to aid,
Parents and friends, with watchful eye,
To guard my tottering steps would fly.
Now, 'mid the clustering flowers I stray,
Or on the clear brook's margin play,
'Till the sun's parting lustres burn,
Go fearless forth, and safe return;
Yet One my unvarying path doth share,
Who guides me with a Father's care,

When weary on my pillow laid,
Mild evening draws her curtain's aid,
And busy dreams with powerful sway,
Bring back the pleasures of the day,
When the last form that lingered near,
My tender mother, ever dear,
Hath left her kiss, hath breathed her prayer,
And in sweet rest resigned her care,
Still One, whose eye can never sleep,
Around my bed His watch doth keep.
